Objectives

The main objectives of the project:

- to provide a meeting place for small-scale food-producers
- to facilitate the start of new businesses and to support existing producers
- to mediate applied and practical knowledge between small-scale producers within the region as well as knowing to support food production which is ecologically grown and sustainably produced

Achievements

One of the main achievements of the project has been to demonstrate how sustainable rural development can come to life through:

- co-operation
- networking
- profitability
- and the mobilisation of local people

Co-operation with French and German small-scale food-producers has also been achieved. Excursions to these countries have been made and experts from France and Germany have been teaching some of the courses organised by Eldrimner. This provides both a local and international dimension to the lessons that can be learnt at Eldrimner.

Jämtland is a region in the North of Sweden near the Norwegian border. It is the third largest region in the country, measuring 54,197 square kilometres, but also one of the most sparsely populated in the European Union, with only 128,586 inhabitants. Only one major city, Östersund, can be considered as densely inhabited, as one third of the region’s population lives there. The emigration of young people and women has been a problem for some forty years. Today, Jämtland is one of the three regions in Sweden with the highest average of old people.

The total area only 1% is used for agriculture, 1% is built-up area, 9% is covered by water, 49% by forest, 16% swamp and 25% mountains and other unused land. The length of the vegetative period in the region is only 170 days compared to 270 days in Southern Sweden.

Average farm sizes in Jämtland are small (averaging 21 hectares). They are also dispersed, often with several kilometres between the farms in the Northern and Western corners of the region. This has led to difficulties in maintaining infrastructure and basic services, since the farms are not clustered together in villages that can support small business and shops.

Despite all its difficulties, Jämtland is considered a special place, thanks to its strong regional identity and the closely interacting communities that are working together to ensure their future economic and social development.

An Old Story for a New Beginning

Once upon a time, it all started with a cooking pot. In traditional Nordic mythology, Eldrimner was a miraculous cauldron, in which the even more miraculous pig Särämär would be cooked. Särämär had a special quality. It resurrected every time it had been eaten, thus providing never-ending food for the Nordic Gods and people.

“We when thought about a name for our project, someone came up with the old tale” remembers Bodil Conell, Eldrimner’s project manager in Rösta. Traditions are strong among people in Jämtland and this time they became an inspiration for a new beginning in the area.

The strong local community tradition and the involvement of the people in creating new ideas and projects existed long before the EU’s policy for rural development. “The spirit was there, when we started in 2001”, explains Bodil Conell. “The idea to provide special knowledge about how to blend local traditions with new ideas from other regions was a success and well received right from the beginning”.

Today, Eldrimner offers courses for small-scale food refinement such as cheese making, pork butchering, and the processing of berries and vegetables. The courses also include marketing, economics and legislation on food-production. Besides the courses, Eldrimner provides help with learning the procedures involved in starting and managing small enterprises. It has also collated an inventory of techniques for the small-scale refinement of rural products. In several locations, people have the opportunity to try out production processes and learn about how to sell their products on the market. In the Rösta dairy, which is managed by the agricultural college, courses in cheese making are held. The dairy has a small shop in which the local products are sold. Close to the dairy, a new facility for pork butchering is being constructed. Here, producers will be able to attend courses and try out their own ideas. Finally, a mobile production unit with modern equipment for all kinds of dairy, pork, berries and vegetables refinement is for rent on a weekly basis at a low price. The unit can be transported to the producer’s own farm, or it can be used at Eldrimner’s facilities in Rösta.

An annual fair, called Särämär in honour of the miraculous pig, is held to promote the products. This is a popular opportunity for the local producers and wider public to meet and to communicate the values behind the project. The fair includes exhibitions, quality assessments, seminars and discussions concerning the futures of locally produced small-scale food-businesses.

For the future, Eldrimner has ambitious plans. “We want to become independent from government and EU funding”, explains Bodil Conell. “Farmers in Jämtland have traditionally relied on a mix of economic activities: agriculture, forestry and small-scale production. The revival of traditional production combined with new skills and strategies will be the key for a successful future”. Eldrimner, the old cooking pot, could again do the trick and keep the community alive and vibrant.
Rural Development and Environment: Initiatives that Make a Difference

Funding

Eldrimner receives 6.075.000 SEK (674.399 Euro) for the project. 60% of the budget is EU-financed and 40% is financed through national means. Public funding for the project comes through the European Union's Structural Funds. Given the difficult climatic conditions of the region, which limit, for example, the agricultural growing season to a mere one hundred and seventy days, Jämtland benefits from higher rates of EU funding, this also as regards Rural Development money from the Common Agricultural Policy, through the Swedish Environment and Rural Development Programme (Miljö- och Landsbygdsprogram).

Environment

The region has the advantage of an unspoiled environment and an abundance of natural resources. Fifty-three per cent of the overall agricultural production in Jämtland is now under organic production. The producers involved in the Eldrimner project are all using ecological methods of production and most of them are approved by KRAV, the Swedish certificate for organically grown products. Eldrimner illustrates in a practical way how local sustainable development can be initiated by local people and by connecting social, economic and ecological aspects in the local development process.
